Attack in Westminster: what happened?

On Wednesday 22 March in the afternoon, there was a serious incident outside Parliament in London, which police have described as a terrorist attack.

Five people were killed, including the attacker who was shot dead by armed police.

Scotland Yard, who run the police in London, say the attacker was 52-year-old Khalid Masood.

They say they "believe that Masood acted alone on the day and there is no information or intelligence to suggest there are further attacks planned."

The head of counter terrorism at the Metropolitan Police, Mark Rowley, said: "It is still our belief that this attacker was inspired by international terrorism."

At around 2:40pm on Wednesday, a single attacker drove a car along Westminster Bridge and hit many pedestrians.

He then crashed the car into railings near the Houses of Parliament, before running towards Parliament where he attacked a police officer.

Brazil's rotten meat scandal: what we know

Brazil, the world's biggest beef and poultry exporter, has been hit by stomach-churning allegations of corrupt practices in its meat industry.

One of the most eye-popping allegations came in a press conference by police investigator Mauricio MoscardiGrillo, who said some meat processing plants had been using "carcinogenic products" to mask rotten meat.

One of them was sorbic acid, according to agriculture ministry inspector Daniel Gouveia Teixeira, who described it as "a decontaminating agent to reduce bacterial contamination and hide odours and other characteristics of rotten meat."

One processing plant switched out the labels on expired meat to change the expiration dates, according to investigators.

Investigators also found salmonella bacteria in products exported from one plant owned by the major multinational group BRF.

Another shocking allegation is that BRF mixed chicken with cardboard, as one employee appeared to say in another intercepted phone call.

But that claim is false, the government and the company now say.
